

THE EQUIBIT LAWSUIT:

ALLEGED STATE-LEVEL SABOTAGE OF A CANADIAN BLOCKCHAIN INNOVATOR

Chris Horlacher is a Canadian technology founder who developed Equibit, a blockchain protocol designed for decentralized securities issuance and transfer. Starting in 2010 and intensifying during and after the company's operation, Horlacher alleges he was subjected to a coordinated campaign of surveillance, technical sabotage, financial warfare, and regulatory pressure. The evidence includes router compromises using the TR-069 protocol, DNS man-in-the-middle attacks, live Microsoft intrusions, multiple external honeypot probes, de-banking, and the alleged involvement of a CSIS-linked individual inside the company. Horlacher has meticulously documented the case and is pursuing justice through the Ontario Superior Court while making the evidence public.

“

I built a legitimate Canadian technology company with federal research funding. What followed was not market failure - it was a coordinated campaign of sabotage involving technical attacks, financial warfare, and institutional pressure.

“

When a suspected CSIS officer embeds himself in your company, gains executive control during crisis, and the technical attacks align perfectly with his access, you start asking very serious questions.

“

The network probe on my honeypot wasn't random. It named itself after my system. This is state-level surveillance being turned against a private citizen.

“

I've been forced into exile in Mexico because traveling to the United States or even staying in Canada became too dangerous. This should concern every innovator and citizen in the Five Eyes nations.

“

We are building the public record so that when this reaches trial, no one can claim they didn't know.
